

Nonprofit Boards: Roles, Responsibilities, And Performance

STRENGTHEN YOUR BOARD'S LEADERSHIP BY INCREASING ITS UNDERSTANDING OF PROGRAMS

Many organizations are committed to improving their board's overall performance but struggle to know where to start. An area that may not immediately come to mind, but could have a sizeable impact on your board, is an understanding of your organization's programs. Leading with Intent: 2017 National Index of Nonprofit Board Practices found that a "strong understanding of programs is linked to stronger board engagement, strategy, and external leadership — including fundraising." In fact, chief executives rank "knowledge of organization's programs" as the fourth most important characteristic of board impact on organizational performance.

This resource outlines how a strong understanding of programs can impact board performance and suggests ways in which a board can strengthen its members' knowledge of programs.

AN UNDERSTANDING OF PROGRAMS MATTERS

Strategic thinking, planning, and decision making

The board's role in strategy encompasses strategic thinking and decision making about the organization's future, helping develop and then adopting a strategic plan or framework, and monitoring organizational performance as it relates to previously set goals.

This finding should come as no surprise. Can you imagine making decisions about your organization without knowing what it does, why it matters, and how you are — or are not — having an impact?

One of a board member's most important roles is to ask insightful questions and question assumptions. Understanding the big picture — the environment in which an organization operates and any challenges or opportunities that have recently arisen and how they relate to your programs — is crucial.

Commitment and engagement

Many nonprofit leaders choose to join a board because they have a connection of some sort to the organization — a specific tie to its mission or a feeling that their skills are uniquely needed. Occasionally, however, a board member's engagement or commitment wanes over time. Continuing to connect board members to an organization's programs is one of the best ways to ensure they remain interested and invested in their work.

A strong knowledge of an organization's programs can also help board members identify where their skills are most useful. Proactively offering to lend financial expertise to a program that is struggling to earn revenue, for example, or volunteering at an upcoming event can increase board members' personal connections to the organization.
